Good morning, Mr. Hunt, I hope you are feeling better since your indisposition of the last few days; this murky February weather is exceeding trying to delicate constitutions, and particularly so, I should think, to persons troubled with throat, or lung affections. And more particularly so to persons advanced in life, as I am, said Mr. Hunt, and whose vitality has long been taxed with close attention to business; I begin to feel that I am an old man. If there is truth in the sayings of the good Book, my allotment of days is nearly at an end; I shall be seventy next June, if I should live so long. I trust, sir, you may live yet a score of years, replied John Martin, Jr. , for it was he who had been addressing the retiring head of the firm, having entered his private office which he still retained in the banking-house; I trust a good Providence may keep you here among us yet a long time. Good men are rather scarce in this city, and getting scarcer I think, as the temptations to avarice, licentiousness, and false pride multiply amongst us. It would, I need not say, be a grievous trial for me, sir, to be deprived of your kindly smile and wholesome counsels. You have been a world of comfort and benefit to me, Mr. Hunt. Next to my own family, you are nearer to my heart than anyone on...
